Creating Communities in San Francisco

Gus Lee's Chinatown Boy and William Woytowich's The Eighth Promise chronicle the struggles of two Chinese Americans, a Chinese-born man and a U.S.-born woman, respectively, in San Francisco. Chinatown Boy (a novel that according to the author in a thinly veiled autobiography) describes the tribulations of a Chinese American boy and a Jewish boy, who were both children of the Depression and the war, and who eventually found each other and connected across language barriers.

Chinatown Boy and The Eighth Promise both explore themes of identity, belonging, and the challenges of navigating a world often hostile to people of color. Lee's protagonist, a Chinese boy named Best, grows up in a San Francisco Chinatown that is a microcosm of larger social and political issues. Woytowich's protagonist, a Jewish boy named Tony, also grows up in San Francisco, but his experience is shaped by his own cultural heritage and the broader historical context of the time.

Both novels are important contributions to the literature of the West, offering insights into the lives of Chinese Americans during a time of great social and political upheaval. They highlight the resilience and strength of these communities in the face of adversity and the importance of community and family in times of crisis.
