Kopjes consist of piles of granite boulders, while others are solid mountains of granite. Here and there they are peeled by exfoliation. This type of hill formation is variously known by geomorphologists as a "sugar loaf" dome, inselberg, or bornhardt. Geomorphologists attribute all these hill forms to scrap retreat and the growth of pediments, a process known as pediplanation.

Kopje is not vocabular to Shona. Inselberg is not part of the language nor is bornhardt or hillock.

A black lexicographer would look at the stone, nucleal, a massed horizon, and say "mware," He would say mware is to inwrought with life, with history. It is day to day and practical; a place, broad and flat, where maize dries in the sun, or a house has its foundation, or where a bull is slaughtered to herald a birth, a death, the coming of the rains.

He would say in the makomo, the mountains of stone, our roots and defence are corporate. Mt. Matonjeni, the ancient oracle is the voice of our God. The spirits of our ancestors keep Mt. Mutemwa; a spring of pure water may appear there, descending silently from its summit, or beautiful cattle may walk on its smooth sides and disappear. A lost traveller can find food in its caves.

Our independence derives from stone pitched from stone. The caves of Mutiwaura fortressed our warriors. They hurled down spears, arrows, the mountain itself, until the invader, the big tree, was felled.

What is exfoliation to a person whose home is here, who has danced, dried maize and offered libations to his ancestors here?

If the prophet, Chaminuka who is primary to our identity, and synonymous with our hope, is alive in Mt. Mandawe, if the spirit of our warriors is there still, and what is hurled is a compilation of every rock and arrow, then the big tree will go on falling, and this must be the meaning of greyness, granite, and stone.
