This book was not written for either the professional archaeologist or the knowledgeable layman. The author states that most people get little information on Native Americans after the fourth grade, and that would seem to be the audience at which the book is aimed. With the exception of museum visits, the bibliography cited draws on published sources exclusively, with little if any unpublished materials being examined. The book’s title is a misnomer, because its contents consist largely of generalizations about indigenous California coastal cultures after contact, gathered from those published sources and recounted in a casual, rambling style. The exciting new direction of anthropological research that is aimed at Pleistocene seafarers traversing open waters to explore and settle coastal and insular land masses at lowered sea levels is mentioned only in passing.

In this beautiful video, Barbareño Chumash descendant Ernestine Ygnacio-De Soto shares the story of six generations of the Indian side of her family, reaching back to the arrival of the Spanish expedition of Portolá in 1769. The story, as told through the eyes of women in six generations of Ernestine’s family, is the result of her collaboration with John R. Johnson of the Santa Barbara Museum of Natural History. In both his anthropological and personal interest in the culture and history of the Chumash Indians, Johnson picks up where the famed linguist, John Peabody Harrington, left off in his ongoing interest in Ernestine’s family. Harrington was introduced to the Ygnacio family by famed California anthropologist Alfred Kroeber. Harrington became virtually part of the family over 50 years of interaction, to such a degree that in his declining years Ernestine’s mother, Mary Yee,
